Primary country/region of work

Topics in order of importance

Which scenarios are you worried about for European/global CME-CPD?

- CME regulations being out of touch with a world where anyone, anywhere with an internet connection can learn about medical therapy options.
- Lack of national support for CME-CPD
- European medical societies not separating CME/IME symposia/activities from industry-satellites and promotional sponsorships
- Lack of relevance and relation to workplace learning
- HCPs not claiming CME following an activity

Hope for the future? — 1

- UEMS is too small to actually monitor global compliance
- Increasing irrelevance of CME points at conferences since more health care professionals opt for alternative sources of points
- More creative content delivery formats are accepted post-pandemic
- Increasing reliance on national accreditation bodies means avoiding UEMS entirely
- Decreasing association budgets gives rise to questioning the need for CMEs
- We receive an answer from EACCME that they are willing to initiate a conversation with other PCOs
- Hopeful due to the recent Cologne Consensus Conference and the International Academy for CPD Accreditation. I believe that there is an evolving opportunity for continued growth of independent CPD and accreditation and value of education in the European landscape
- There appears to be more interest in aligning accreditation standards
- The work done by the International Academy for CPD Accreditation. Substantial Equivalency Framework facilitating recognition between CE accreditors based on shared principles and values
- Accrediting bodies updating their standards in an attempt to align with the times

Hope for the future? — 2

- More connection and discussion between US and global CME/CPD professionals to help lift up all standards and awareness, as much of the education has become global in nature.
- I continue to see occasional innovative CME-CPD activities on the global level. I was recently involved in an association's longitudinal learning group over a 6 month period, where I continued to be engaged and learn from experts in the technology of the future and how it might impact healthcare. More events such as this are needed to evolve the profession.
- Not really...there seem to be so many obstacles for effective global CME including the inability for the funders to understand what "global" really means
- The acceleration in new technologies in healthcare drives clinicians and health care professionals to upskill and widen their horizons and competences
- A lot of developments in the education / edtech industry, which I believe can help to streamline the production and distribution of high quality content.
- More involvement of the patient voice in the development process and needs assessment
- More recognition of diversity and cultural aspects in the development process of CME-CPD
- Patient voice in CME
- Recognition of workplace learning as CPD
- I have the feeling that we are progressing, anyway
- It will be my first CME so just excited to learn from others
- In general the effort to create partnerships, collaborations and networking

Final thoughts

- I think that CME Forum should also look at original initiatives like French based DPC; what can CME providers learn?
- Also, there are interesting SaaS initiatives to follow, which are just "at the edge" of CME
- I think pharma has an essential role to play in financing CME. But, the "guidance framework" should go further and further improve (accreditors, regulator etc), which will foster professionalization of CME
- Very interested in how synergies European CPD with US IME and demonstrate value to health ministries and most importantly patients
- When will Europe have full global accreditation standards and certification such as ACCME in the US
- Looking forward to learning how the landscape of CME is changing in the current context and challenges
- This is a major topic. To maximize learning output and outcome in the realm of CPD, it is critical to create an effective and vibrant networking involving the myriad of stakeholders involved.
- Please consider again virtual participation, at least for selected sessions in the future
